No. 28. the tomb of desaix on mount st. bernard. Desaix, a man who was as feeling as he was brave, had often repeated on seeing the tombs of the Arabs, that the aspect of the de sert was that of death for the living and peace for the dead. When the assigning a place for the tomb of this hero was in question, Napoleon fancied he was acting conformably to the melancholy ideas of him whose memory he cherished, by fixing on the Church of the Monastery of Mount St. Bernard, the most elevated and the most silent of all European habitations. He caused a magnificent tomb to be erected, and ornamented with a bas relief, which represented the moment he received his death wound and fell from his horse. The hero is received in the arms of his aid-de-camp the Duke...
